A Visit to Petersburg.

[From the Episcopal Methodist.]
We paid a visit to the famous 'lines' around which the late fearful contest was so long concentrated. For 15 miles earthworks extended. The object of the Federal army was to get possession of railroads, by which the scanty food of Lee's army was transported. For this purpose, Grant had only to continue his lines, from day to day, as men arrived to make and man them. The lines were made before and behind his troops, and a railway running between, daily brought supplies of all necessities. The starving Confederates could hear the Federal supply train coming with the regularity of a clock to furnish their enemies. As the Federal lines extended, the Southern were necessarily extended parallel with them; but as no more men came to man the longer lines, they were finally undeended. At last there was but one soldier to fifteen paces, and the Federal army had scarcely an obstacle before them. The struggle against this fearful odds was the bravest and most skillful known to history. The North ought to be proud of the people who did such deeds. We went to see "the crater," as it is called. It is the fort under which the mine was exploded. Our readers all remember the horrible story. We traced the mine from the bottom of the hill, where its opening was concealed, to the fort where the ten tons of powder were exploded. Into the hole it excavated—a column of Federal soldiers was driven on the afternoon of the explosion; and from that hole nine hundred of their bodies were taken. Five thousand fell on that terrible day on the narrow field between the lines, not more than eighty yards apart. This field was covered when I saw it with cotton plants—the de-throned king in the midst of the ruins of his empire. It was melancholy to see the young peach trees that marked the line of Confederate entrenchments, where the seed had been thrown by the soldiers. Alas! how few of those who carelessly planted those trees, survived the horrors of that awful strife! There is a National Cemetery here. We visited it with painful feelings. Five thousand bodies of Federal soldiers are decently buried in it, and with them a few of the Confederates. We were pleased to see that the tombstones of the latter were marked, not for Rebel but for Confederate soldiers. How sad that these young men from Maine should have fallen here by the hands of those young men from Texas! What awful plagues of a country are mediocrity in high places, and fanaticism in low!

Petersburg itself is a wonder. Since the siege of Troy, few cities have been so surrounded with armies. For years the sound of cannon, by day and night, was perpetual. Bombs were frequently thrown into the town. The people lived as in a besieged camp; some had caves in their yards; some resorted to cellars; the women lived in continual danger of the city being taken by storm. The men were all constantly exposed to death. Yet the beautiful little city came out of the fire unhurt, and the inhabitants are as serene, and courteous, and hospitable as ever.

We extracted some tales of gallantry and self sacrifice, but it is hard to get them. These people are so familiar with heroic deeds of men and women, that they seldom mention the subject. Indeed, it would be very dull to tell a story of daring or endurance to a company, every one of whom, perhaps, could be as remarkable a one of himself. I heard a pretty good one—not of the fighting kind, but of the endurance kind. It was in the cars, going to Richmond, and had a seat at the extreme end. The car was filled with officers and soldiers. A woman of humble appearance, entered at one of the stations, and finding no seat, and none having been offered her, approached the General. He immediately rose and gave her his seat. Immediately there was a general rising and protesting of seats to "Mass Robert," but he calmly said: "No, gentlemen, if there was no seat for the infirm old woman, there can be none for me." The effect was remarkable. One after another got out of the car, as if the seat were hot to sit on, and the General and the old lady seated him on the seat before them where to choose. Such stories are better than tales of blood. It is harder to be a gentleman than a soldier, and a great deal better. Of General Lee, himself the most remarkable thing is not his military talent; it is very great, but, perhaps, of the highest order; but the singular thing is that, during the whole war, he seems never to have said, or uttered, or done anything that was not creditable to him. After the most diligent inquiry, Northern slanderers have not been able even to manufacture a lie, which had cohesiveness enough to stick to the public mind for a day; and the free gossip of his own camp has not produced a single anecdote that could not be told to his honor. He will go down to history as personally faultless. Now we are satisfied that Mass Robert has faults. We worship no man; we do not choose, in our own disparagement, to think too well of other people. But we do wonder at the perfect self-dominion of General Lee, and the perfection of that gentlemanly which, even in its lower degrees, is so hard to attain, and which is suffering dangerous violence in this carnival of vulgarity through which we are living.
